Around the Police Station

John Oliver appeared before Judge Andrade yesterday morning. He did not deny that he had been drunk, but he thought that it was a very venial offense. But the Judge did not look at it that way. He mentioned the fact that this same John Oliver had already been arrested twenty-two times for the same offense. This being the twenty-third time, the court considered that it was quite enough for the time being. "You shall not have a chance to appear before me for some time to come," said Judge Andrade. "Not for sixty days, for you shall go to jail for that length of time." And John went.

Facetious Josephus.
Joseph Oliver was also brought before Judge Andrade for the same offense as that of his namesake. Now Joseph would be facetious and blithe some. When he was asked where he lived, he said "in England." "I do not mean where you were born," said the court, "but where you live." "In Newcastle-on-Tyne," was the cheerful answer. "It is quite unnecessary to try to be funny. Where did you last go to bed?" was the stern rejoinder, and the reply came back swiftly and solemnly, "In the Queen's Hospital." Joseph's attempts at levity may cost him dear. Judge Andrade told him that he would not pass sentence until the morning, so the humorist will have passed another night in his cell before his case is decided.

A Human Phonograph.
Ah Lun, the human phonograph, will have a chance to play all his records over and over again without disturbance. He was committed to the pupule house yesterday afternoon. Ah Lun had a habit of sitting on the curb and communing with voices which he imagined emanated from his chest. He made himself a target for many small boys and their jests and so was taken into custody last Friday. He was interviewed by Deputy Sheriff Rose, who was initiated into the mysteries of listening to the mystic sounds that Ah Lun declared exuded from his interior at inopportune moments. Dr. Mackall and Judge Andrade concurred in believing that Ah Lun had bats in his belfry, and he was sent to a place where the bats could buzz undisturbed.

George Loses a Demijohn.
George had a demijohn of whisky. He got off the Waikiki car near Kapalani Park last night and sat down by the roadside. Then he went to sleep. Along came a wagon with two humorists on board. They espied the sleeping form of George and also the demijohn.

The two humorists stayed their wagon and proceeded to annex the demijohn. They each took a swig and then another one and another and another and another and another one.

By this time they were feeling so good that they made enough noise to wake the recumbent George. He stood up and wanted to fight. The humorists refused to fight, but insisted on baptizing George in the supposedly corn-made mixture.

This annoyed George and he complained to a policeman who happened along. When the strong arm of the law appeared the humorists hit their wagon and vanished. When asked his full name, George said it was Kecaumoku-nuahilapalapohamoku. The policeman, well acquainted with the Hawaiian language, arrested him for "Less Majesty," but let him go when he confessed that he had made the name up as he went along.

AND for cribs, baby carriages, or go-carts, see J. Hopp & Co. They have many styles of go-carts and carriages, one go-cart is only $275.
